

POEMS67.COM

POEM IN ENGLISH

MOLLY CROSS-BLANCHARD

FIRST TIME SMUDGE

It takes eight matches, a burnt thumb, and a quick Google search to light the sweetgrass braid Mom scored for me from an elder at work. Always use matches, she said. Spirit likes matches.
I don't have the abalone shell or eagle feather — water and air — so I just hold them in my mind, cup the smoke to my face, my left chest, down the fronts of my calves to my feet. I notice too late I forgot to change the Spotify playlist to something more traditional. Hopefully Spirit likes Jimmy Eat World. I think about the word smudge while I coax the smoke into each corner of my bedroom, the way it might mean a smeared mark, like how the message from him apologizing for the women in my bed was a smudge on my inbox today. The way I felt when I read it, a smudging of my cool front. I want to think of the word smudge as wiping away but to soil is simpler than to cleanse and I'm afraid all this smoke can't smudge his spirit from the air here. I open the window, cough an acrid cough into the dark. I notice too late: the Google article said to keep it open from the very beginning.